Skittles ice breaker template

I'm a new leader in my church for 10 and 11 year old girls. I'm brand new to the field and I don't know anyone my age, let alone these younger ladies. so in our first action, I think we'll start with a little getting to know you in the game. I wanted to combine some issues with some fun and of course a bit of a sweet treat! (this is the best way to win over any group of 10 and 11 year old girls, btw.) introducing skittles game.instructions:1. go around the bowl, making sure it is overhead as they reach the edge.4. whatever color they do pick, it's a question they have to answer.5. keep going around the room until everyone has either answered all the questions, or until all the skittles are gone.you've probably thought of one little glitch in the game already: what happens when a person claws the same color twice? well, you could do a lot of things when this happens. You can just let them eat skittle and go to the next person, or they could do a little action like 5 jumping jacks, or they might have to repeat the answer that someone else in the group has given.this really is a fun icebreaker and can be used by all kinds of groups. and does not limit their skittles... m & m's or Mike & Ike's is also a tasty alternative ☺download a pdf copy of the skittles game I absolutely LOVE quick, easy and interesting icebreakers. I don't just do one on the first day of school, I time to plug one every day in the first week. They are a super-fun way for me to learn about my students and get to know their classmates, all of which help to promote a kind, caring and positive atmosphere. such as an additional family. There's a month of birthday in our house. My birthday was the first, and my husband threw a great karaoke party to celebrate! Then my son Connelly's birthday was Saturday, and now my daughter Oaklyn's birthday is today. Whew. We have had several parties in our house, and on Friday night I hosted a get together for my friends to celebrate my 30th birthday. It was a blast! I haven't stayed until 5:00 am because I was probably 13. (And I won't be doing it anytime soon either, you can say exhaustion!?!?) It was really fun to stay up late talking and playing games. My rockstar husband took kiddos to stay at my brother's and sister's law house for the night. So, we had a house to ourselves. Well, as part of the party's plan, I wanted to play these fun skittles to get to know you in a game that I learned when I was presidential ambassador to the University of Southern Utah. I think it would be a fun way to get to know things about your friends that you don't usually talk about. Here's what you do. You send around a bowl of skittles without telling them that it's part of your game. You tell them not to eat their skittles yet though. So, after everyone has a bunch of skittles you explain that for every skittle they have, they need to tell you something about themselves. For every red skittle, you tell embarrassing moments or memorable moments in your life. For every orange skittle, you tell the goal of who you are. For every purple skittle, you tell accomplishment. For every yellow skittle, you tell you about the hobby or interest that you have. For every green skittle, you'll tell you about your favorites. This could be your favorite food, your favorite vacation, your favorite brand of lip gloss., u.c. gloss. Etc.
